- People living in rural and remote areas face persistent health care challenges including hospital and clinic closures, geographic isolation, workforce shortages, economic and demographic shifts, high burdens of chronic disease, and high rates of traumatic injuries.
- Telementoring can improve rural health by building local capacity, reducing professional isolation, improving access to care, and sharing best practices. It can transform training and education through a range of uses; clinical knowledge and task shifting, workforce development and training, rapid implementation, clinic management, and operation support, and professional development activities.
- The Rural Telementoring Training Center (RTTC) provides free training, tools, and technical assistance to support the implementation and evaluation of new and current telementoring programs for rural health workers.
